A novel human immunodeficiency virus type 1 subtype B (HIV-1B) was discovered in Turkey in 2009. The present work reports the molecular characterization of the env gene of a Turkish subtype B. Env regions were amplified by nested-PCR from retroviral DNA samples of a chronically infected Turkish woman. The presence of particular mutations within the env gene at putative recombination sites was investigated. According to recombination analysis, the env gene of this virus appeared to have been synthesized from two separate genetic elements. The env fragments of the subtype B (HIV-1B) sequences reported here were the most divergent ones. The substitution D186N was common to each HIV-1B variant analyzed; however, the substitution I184T was common to the Turkish subtype B (HIV-1B) strain only. The env gene of the Turkish subtype B (HIV-1B) was characterized as a new recombinant that is unique in terms of recombination analysis and substitutions observed. In addition, the 3da54e8ca3
