SoftPandiLand.com Receptor-mediated recognition and activation of leukocytes in inflammation and immunity. Many aspects of immunity have been elucidated by the use of monoclonal antibodies and recombinant lymphokines. These studies have shown that specific receptors on leukocytes recognize molecular determinants on the surface of foreign pathogens and activate leukocytes involved in host defense. Lymphocytes express receptors for target antigens during lymphocyte activation in vivo. Recent experiments have shown that there are two types of lymphocytes: (a) antigen-activated cells that mediate lymphocyte-directed cytotoxicity and cytokine production, and (b) long-lived memory cells that mediate protection against reinfection. It is these antigen-dependent memory cells that mediate immune protection by lymphocytes. The activation of lymphocytes by receptors in inflammation and immunity is mediated by processes that enhance the expression of specific receptors on lymphocytes. Stimulation of lymphocytes in vitro results in the upregulation of surface and functional receptors for target antigen, for adhesion molecules, and for certain types of lymphokine-receptors. Receptors for the antigen, adhesion molecules, and lymphokine-receptors are activated by peptide ligands or antibodies on the foreign pathogen or host cells. These activated receptors "percept" the presence of the foreign invader and function in antigen or lymphokine recognition and in receptor-mediated activation. Written and directed by Kasra Farahani.
