Computer tomography in acute brain injury: a comparison of adults and children. Contrast-enhanced, noncontrast-enhanced, and nontraumatic plain computed tomography (CT) scans were obtained in the emergency department (ED) of two large, urban hospitals for the evaluation of acute brain injury in 75 children and 103 adults. In children, there was a sensitivity of 92% for detecting abnormalities of any type, and specificities of 91%, 88%, and 90% for abnormalities of the subarachnoid space, brain stem, and intracerebral hematoma, respectively. In adults, the sensitivities for abnormalities of any type, and specificities for abnormalities of the subarachnoid space and intracerebral hematoma, were 67%, 60%, and 60%, respectively. In children, the sensitivity for abnormalities of the brain stem was 98%, and the specificity was 54%; in adults, the sensitivity was 71% and the specificity was 99%. The data suggest that in children with acute brain injury, CT scanning should be part of a complete evaluation protocol, and is sufficiently sensitive to detect abnormalities of the subarachnoid space, brain stem, and intracerebral hematoma, but has low specificity. In adults, CT scanning does not adequately detect the smallest hematoma, and other imaging techniques should be considered. Notes on A Brief History of Time, Part I by Stephen Hawking Hiding deep in a Chinese bamboo grove, it is difficult to imagine the most famous scientific theorist of our age, but when I finally meet him, his first words of greeting are in English: "Hello, Professor Hawking. May I sit down?" It is a singular experience to meet Stephen Hawking, a man who has become so renowned as the theoretical physicist who predicted the existence of black holes before it was proven to be true. The fact that Hawking is wheelchair-bound — unable to speak for himself — is taken as a badge of honor, emblematic of his "cele
